Questions 71-75 : Read the following passage an answer the questions that follow :

Two continua of social reality are useful in developing the major levels of the social world. The first is the microscopic-macroscopic continuum. Thinking of the social world as being made up of a series of entities ranging from those large in scale to those small in scale is relatively easy, because it is so familiar. Most people in their day to day lives conceive of the social world in these terms.

The continuum is based on the simple idea that social phenomena vary greatly in size. At the macro end of the continuum are such large-scale social phenomena as groups of societies (for example, the Capitalist World System), Societies and cultures. At the micro end are individual actors and their thoughts and actions. In between are a wide range of meso-level phenomena groups, collectivities, social classes and organizations. We have little difficulty recognizing these distinctions and thinking of the world in micro-macro terms. There are no clear dividing lives between the micro social units and the macro units. Instead, there is a continuum ranging from the micro to the macro ends.

SEAL

Latest Sarkari Jobs, Govt Exam Results, Vacancies and updates on one click Know More

The second continuum is the objective-subjective dimension of social analysis. At each end of the micro-macro continuum (and everywhere in between) we can differentiate between objective and subjective components. At the micro, or individual level there are the mental subjective processes of an actor and the objective patterns of action and interaction in which he or she engages. Subjective here refers to something that occurs solely in the realm of ideas, objective relates to realm material events. This same differentiation is found at the macro end of the continuum. A society is made up of objective structures, such as governments, bureaucracies and laws and subjective phenomena, such as norms and values.

In general, an objective social phenomenon has a real, material existence. We can think of the following, among others, as objective social phenomena: actors, action, interaction, bureaucratic structures, law and the state apparatus. It is possible to see, touch, or chart all these objective phenomena. However, there are social phenomena that exist solely in the realm of ideas; they have no material existence. These are sociological phenomena such as mental processes, the social construction of reality (Berger and Luckmann, 1967), norms, values and many elements of culture. The problem with the objective - subjective continuum is that there are many phenomena in the middle that have both objective and subjective elements. The family for example has a real material existence as well as a series of subjective mutual understandings, norms and values. Similarly, the polity is composed of objective laws and bureaucratic structures as well as subjective political norms and values. In fact is probably true that the vast majority of social phenomena are mixed types that represent some combination of objective and subjective elements. Thus it is best to think of the objective-subjective continuum as two polar types with the series of variously mixed types in the middle.

71. Statement I: In the analysis of social reality two continua are useful. They are: Micro-Macro continuum and Object-Subjective dimension.
Statement II: Social reality is very simple to understand, hence we need simple models.
